“The variety in the landscape would drive an artist to distraction. It is a singular mixture of the wild and the tame, of the austere and the cheerful…”

—Martha Lamb, 1876
As you use this guide to explore the Florence Griswold Museum, you will walk the grounds enjoyed by Miss Florence Griswold (1850–1937) and the painters of the Lyme Art Colony who took up residence in her house beginning in 1899. Experience first-hand the environment of one of the largest Impressionist art colonies in America, including the Robert F. Schumann Artists’ Trail. This new addition to the Museum, opened in 2019, offers an opportunity to take in the natural, artistic, and historic highlights of our site via a half-mile, ADA-accessible pathway that links the fragments of the original Griswold estate for the first time since 1956. Inside this guide, you will find a detailed map with points of interest around the Museum and along the trail.

A Robert & Nancy Krieble Gallery: Designed by Centerbrook Architects and opened in 2002, this award-winning gallery houses the admissions desk (January–March), changing exhibitions, the Museum’s art and archival collections, The Shop, and visitor amenities. A research archive is also available by appointment. The Robert F. Schumann Artists’ Trail starts at the Krieble Gallery’s side entrance.

B Marshfield House: To generate money for the elderly Miss Florence’s care, her estate was sold in 1936 to Judge Robert McCurdy Marsh of New York. He built the house as a weekend and summer retreat in 1937, taking advantage of picturesque views of the Lieutenant River. Privately owned until 1997, Marshfield features a Visitor’s Lounge and hosts Museum programs, private rental events, and Café Flo.

C Café Flo: Enjoy outdoor dining overlooking the Lieutenant River (open May-October).

D John & Dyanne Rafał Landscape Center: The center is open April through December as the Museum’s admissions desk. An exhibition of photographs, tools, and videos inside describes Miss Florence’s gardens and the history of the local landscape. A brief orientation film is also on view.

E John & Kelly Bill Hartman Education Center: The hub of hands-on creative programs for visitors and school groups. Open to the public on Sundays for art projects, including the opportunity to paint your own canvas indoors or out (open Sundays, April-December).

F Florence Griswold House: Home of the Lyme Art Colony. A remarkable series of paintings on the doors and dining room walls is unique in American art. The house is designed to be self-guided, and there are knowledgeable docents inside to provide more information about the period rooms and upstairs galleries.

G William Chadwick Studio: Similar to the studios that once dotted the property, William Chadwick’s studio provides a glimpse into the working methods of the Lyme artists. Moved from Chadwick’s home in Old Lyme to this site and opened in 1993, the shingled building combines a painting room lit by a large north window, a storage loft, and a framing workshop (open April-October).
1. Farm Fields
The Griswold family moved to this property in 1841 and cultivated the land near the Lieutenant River with crops such as corn, oats, potatoes, beans, and hay. During the art colony years, journalists commented on the fresh produce served at Miss Florence's meals, harvested from the Riverside fields. During breaks from painting in his studio (see Woodland Walk), artist William S. Robinson enjoyed cutting hay in these fields with a scythe.

2. Lieutenant River Overlook
This 3.7-mile-long river joins the Connecticut River estuary near Long Island Sound. The Lieutenant River is tidal and brackish, with marshes along its banks. Its wharves once supported shipbuilding and trade of local produce with the West Indies. The river also powered a gristmill, a fulling mill for processing cloth, and a nail factory in which Lyme artists depicted the waterway's picturesque curves on their canvases. For fun, they paddled Florence Griswold's rowboats called Scarlet Fever, Smallpox, and Prickly Heat, launching from a dock whose remains are visible to the north. Today, fish such as shad, white perch, and striped bass frequent the river, as do migrating eels and birds. Great egrets, great blue herons, and mute swans are commonly seen in this area, with bald eagles arriving each winter.

3. Rainwater Garden with Native Plants
The banks of the Griswold land along the Lieutenant River have hosted a range of plants over the years, from native mountain laurel, to white birches, to vegetables cultivated for Florence Griswold's boardinghouse table. Those disturbances and changes in the soil's chemistry allowed invasive plants to take hold. Indigenous plantings have now been added and roads made against non-native plant species. The varieties chosen can tolerate both wet and dry conditions and include rushes, irises, sedge, butterfly weed and other plants that support healthy bird and insect populations. This rainwater garden offers major ecological benefits: it collects and cleans water after a rain to remove toxins before it re-enters the Lieutenant River and recharges the groundwater, contributing to the river's health.

4. Osprey Nests
This location provides the ideal view of osprey nests on the riverbank and in the marsh just across the Lieutenant River (resting on elevated platforms). The birds spend spring and summer in Old Lyme, dining on fish from the river before migrating to South America each September. Ospreys were threatened in the 20th century by the pesticide DDT, as field-guide author Roger Tory Peterson observed from his home upriver from the Museum. Like his friend Rachel Carson, writer of the landmark environmental conservation book Silent Spring, Peterson helped bring awareness to the issue, saving the birds.

5. Bow Bridge
Artists set up easels near where you now stand as a vantage point for painting the Bow Bridge, which once crossed the Lieutenant River near the present-day bridge visible to the southwest. The quaint, wooden arched structure was one of the Lyme artists’ favorite subjects. Lyme Art Colony founder Henry Ward Ranger chose the bridge as the subject for his painting on one of the doors in Florence Griswold’s house. The original bridge was built around 1830 and later raised to allow for the passage of boats filled with salt hay from the marshes. It was replaced with an iron structure in 1914 when car traffic from a new highway bridge over the Connecticut River proved too much of a strain, and again in 1928 with a steel bridge. The footings of the Bow Bridge are still visible on the far bank. The spot where you are standing is on property the Museum acquired in 2016 to reestablish the boundaries of Florence Griswold’s original estate. As our landscape restoration along the Lieutenant River progresses, this vista will eventually include a meadow with native flowers and grasses.

6. Childe Hassam’s Studio Site
Florence Griswold encouraged her artist boarders to use her farm sheds as studios, at least seven of which dotted the estate. A 1998 archaeological dig and evidence from paintings and historic photographs show that Impressionist Childe Hassam’s studio was here at the northwest corner of the orchard. During spring visits, he stepped outside it to paint the flowering apple trees (see his depiction of the studio on the front of this guide). Although the original studio is gone, its shape has been outlined in granite carved with Hassam’s crest. As you walk around it, imagine a rustic room with the smell of turpentine and wet paint, mixed with the scent of fresh grass and apple blossoms. Uneven plank walls and a metal roof would have transmitted the sun’s warmth and the sound of raindrops, as well as the voices of fellow painters stopping by. Hassam kept a pipe in a drawer of the room’s small table and lounged on a sofa he snuck out of another artist’s studio, only to have it disappear when the prank was returned. When renting a guestroom, Hassam requested this studio from Miss Florence, but when he was away other artists moved in to enjoy its advantageous location and river views.

7. Orchard
The Griswold family cultivated fruit trees after they bought the property in 1841. By 1880, one acre of the estate was devoted to an orchard consisting of 40 trees. Historically, varieties included plum, peach, cherry, and apple, and the orchard now hosts heirloom apple trees as well as crabapple, pear, cherry, and plum cultivars. Lyme Art Colony painters set up easels in the orchard, which was a site for outdoor leisure as well as agriculture. Miss Florence sought to manage the orchard well, allowing its use in spraying and pruning demonstrations by the New London County Farm Bureau.

8. Hedgerow
Dating to medieval England, hedgerows were planted around fields to serve as natural fences, windbreaks, and erosion control. In New England, they have often grown up around the remnants of old stone walls. Located at the edges of a property, hedgerows are a rich ecosystem that attracts birds, insects, and mammals, so restoring those areas of our site improves its environmental health. Trees, bushes, and plants of different heights are densely clustered to offer shelter, nest sites, and food to animals, birds, and insects, many of them vital pollinators. Along this old lane, some invasive plant species have been removed and native shrubs and plants added to attract wildlife, insects, and songbirds. Nesting boxes and bat houses have been placed to make them feel at home. During the years of the Lyme Art Colony, the lawn between this path and the Florence Griswold House featured lush vegetation, including what a 1904 newspaper described as “delightful walks among old-fashioned flowers and shrubs” such as bowers of lilacs.

9. Florence Griswold House and Lawn
Considered one of the finest examples of Late-Georgian architecture in America, the Florence Griswold House was built in 1817 for the Noyes family by the architect Samuel Belcher. Upon marriage, Florence Griswold that once stood near the Lieutenant River. This location provides the ideal view of the Bow Bridge, which once crossed the Lieutenant River near the present-day bridge visible to the southwest. The quaint, wooden arched structure was one of the Lyme artists’ favorite subjects. Lyme Art Colony founder Henry Ward Ranger chose the bridge as the subject for his painting on one of the doors in Florence Griswold’s house. The original bridge was built around 1830 and later raised to allow for the passage of boats filled with salt hay from the marshes. It was replaced with an iron structure in 1914 when car traffic from a new highway bridge over the Connecticut River proved too much of a strain, and again in 1928 with a steel bridge. The footings of the Bow Bridge are still visible on the far bank. The spot where you are standing is on property the Museum acquired in 2016 to reestablish the boundaries of Florence Griswold’s original estate. As our landscape restoration along the Lieutenant River progresses, this vista will eventually include a meadow with native flowers and grasses.

10. Woods and Understory
The woods and undergrowth thrived along the banks of the Lyme Art Colony’s favorite stream, Mile Brook. From this spot, you can see the Bow Bridge, which once crossed the Lieutenant River near the present-day bridge visible to the southwest. The quaint, wooden arched structure was one of the Lyme artists’ favorite subjects. Lyme Art Colony founder Henry Ward Ranger chose the bridge as the subject for his painting on one of the doors in Florence Griswold’s house. The original bridge was built around 1830 and later raised to allow for the passage of boats filled with salt hay from the marshes. It was replaced with an iron structure in 1914 when car traffic from a new highway bridge over the Connecticut River proved too much of a strain, and again in 1928 with a steel bridge. The footings of the Bow Bridge are still visible on the far bank. The spot where you are standing is on property the Museum acquired in 2016 to reestablish the boundaries of Florence Griswold’s original estate.
WOODLAND WALK

10. Woods and Understory
Located at the edge of what was once a field, this area of Florence Griswold's original property was historically more overgrown, with tangled vegetation and native plants like laurel that enjoy the shade of the understory, where they are shielded by a canopy of taller trees. Today, evergreen firs, rhododendron, and holly, as well as witch hazel and winterberry have replaced some of the invasive plants that had made their way into this area. Ferns and woodland flowers cover the ground, restoring the grove as a habitat for owls, ducks, and other birds along the nearby stream.

11. Bridge to Lyme Art Association and Mile Brook
Steps here lead to a path and bridge that connect to the Lyme Art Association (LAA). Florence Griswold sold a portion of her property to the LAA in 1917 so the artists could construct a permanent gallery to exhibit their work. Designed by architect Charles Platt, it opened in 1921 with Miss Florence as manager. Mile Brook begins to the northeast at the Boggy Hole Swamp. It passes behind the LAA, where it once broadened into an ice pond for the Griswold family (now largely filled in). What remains of the brook resurfaces beyond the interstate highway, where it flows into the Lieutenant River.

12. Pump House
The concrete structure set into the ground once sheltered a mechanical pump that moved water from the Mile Brook up to Florence Griswold's house. Thank you for not walking on the pump house.

13. Former Robinson Studio Site
In the 1930s, Lyme Art Colony painter William S. Robinson leased a studio from Florence Griswold that once stood near the end of this trail. The ramshackle building existed until the 1980s. From this spot, Robinson contemplated the beauty of the wooded stream, which once formed a pond behind the LAA known as Florence Pool. To extend the view, the Museum plans to continue restoring this landscape. To visit a similar studio used by Impressionist painter William Chadwick, follow the trail toward signs for the Chadwick Studio (seasonal) as you return to the Krieble Gallery.

GARDEN WALK

14. Benjamin Eggleston Portable Studio and Art Cart
Artists came to Old Lyme to paint outdoors. Portable studios helped them do so in cold or wet weather. This cart was recreated from a photograph of artist Benjamin Eggleston’s portable studio, which he could pull to his desired painting spot. Inside, there are kits with hands-on art and nature activities for all ages (open April-November).

15. Miss Florence’s Gardens
Like her mother before her, Miss Florence was an avid gardener. Behind her house there were four distinct gardens: one for herbs and produce such as strawberries, lettuce, peas, corn, and potatoes; one for roses; and two for flowers, which she also sold to make ends meet. Using historic photographs, films, and paintings, these gardens have been re-planted and the white rose trellis re-built to reflect how they appeared to the artists of the colony. Pick up a garden guide at the front desk or Landscape Center to help identify many of the plant species.

16. John & Dyanne Rafal Landscape Center
Built in 1851, this barn was restored in 2009. It once housed the Griswold family’s pigs and dairy cows. Today, an exhibition inside describes the local landscape’s history up through the Lyme Art Colony period.

17. Solitary Garden
A temporary garden by artist Jackie Sumell designed by an incarcerated woman as a restorative gesture to overcome the isolation of confinement.

In the hayloft, you will see the canoe brought to Old Lyme by future president Woodrow Wilson and his family during their summer visits to the art colony (open April-December).

Continue on to the Florence Griswold House or visit the special exhibition in the Krieble Gallery.
Who Was Miss Florence?
By the late 1890s, the Museum’s namesake Florence Griswold (1850–1937) was nearly fifty years old. The youngest child of a once-prosperous sea captain, she outlived her parents and all but one of her three siblings, and faced the future as an unmarried woman with few economic prospects. She inherited the family home along with the costs of its upkeep. To survive, she chose to take in boarders, a common and socially acceptable occupation for women at the time. Fortunately, during the summer of 1899, one of her visitors was Henry Ward Ranger, an American artist looking to establish an art colony in New England. He returned with a group of artists the following year and over the next two decades the Florence Griswold House in Old Lyme was the center of a thriving artist colony.

Thank you for visiting us today!

The Robert F. Schumann Artists’ Trail was made possible through the generosity of the Robert F. Schumann Foundation

Wi-Fi: FLOGRIS-PUB • Password: Welcome2Flogris

The Museum offers a full slate of exhibitions, programs, virtual tours, and online resources. Begin your exploration at FlorenceGriswoldMuseum.org and follow us on Facebook, Instagram, Twitter, and YouTube.

Florence Griswold Museum
Celebrating Art, History, and Nature
96 Lyme Street, Old Lyme, CT 06371